I guess that I'm overloading your nomenclature a bit and I can see your points. I think that the system should still have a "close all sessions" option that will destroy all active sessions.

I have seen the logout of active session cause problems where an application is designed with 2 different security levels (user/admin) and is running on a shared terminal on the factoty floor. A supervisor logs onto the machine and performs some work with multiple sessions and then logs out of all but one session. Not realizing this, he walks away and leaves a security breach for the next person who uses that terminal.

If we have the "Logout of Session" operating and the "Logout of All Sessions" we can cover off both cases. If we need to, we can change the presentation layer's visible action names to meet the needs of the application.
