What you are describing is document-based workflow whereas the Radicore implementation is activity-based, which is slightly different. A document may be passed to any number of people for review and/or amendmemt, and may even go round in a loop several times, which means that it is the same activity that is being repeated an unknown number of times. In Radicore a workflow contains a predictable number of different activities in a predictable sequence, so it cannot easily be amended to deal with the same activity repeated for an unknown number of times.

If you have tasks set up for Review, Approve and Delete then they will appear on the navigation bar if the user has been allowed to access them. There is nothing in the framework which can check for the status of a record before any of these entries are displayed.
